I – BROTHER SON

(i) Thoroughgoing Futuristic Eschatology (Swanage)

Bleak light from window slot, scant glint from wet eyes, old hurt eyes that seem to ask, though the mouth cannot,
'Will I be under earth before you return?'
Strangely shrunken trunk slumped between sermon and tract (a wall of words), so much smaller than when scraping ceiling above my trembling head.
O, how you roared... like Legion, hurling all backsliding to the pit, that Sabbath I refused the bread and wine.
What does an Elder's eldest son, reared for preaching, do, but break bread? An empty seat in the family row—inconceivable!
Whatever would the watchful Brethren say?

Now I block the light above you—stiff-necked, unregenerate, the still prodigal son—long brown hair above sparse grey, sky-blue veins above bruised red,
dust falling between us, clock scratching the silence.
I chafe to leave,

fearing your final words will rear another range between us just when I'd begun to think we breathed the same air.

'I know you've chosen not to offer the Lord your life, but think of end things before it's too late:
His Kingdom is always near and you can never tell the day of your recall....'

I am indeed becoming late, coach-late, so make to go, knowing this farewell will not be the last, for how can a father not be always there, permanent as magnetic North?
A minor heart attack, yes, but surely over that and not terminally ill.

Is it the old presbyterian gloom returning as the body weakens?
As well Prizren as London for chances to meet—and, after all, I'll just be gone a year.
But, though eyes are wet, Thoughts already start to stray elsewhere—back to life, the life of reliable flesh, firm lip on the rim of practice, pleasure, not forward to that afterlife of ghostly milk and honey your toothless gums are now not sipping, alas.

Smug, stupid, blind, crass!

(ii) So Long

He was with us less each year: the belly's skin balloon let down on doctor's orders—no blowouts now; a back bending to the earth he'd soon—too soon—be sealed inside and shoulders turning in on themselves as if this last good fight had been lost before begun; but still the spirit resisted the slow pull of a collapsing body; it stood for the person we'd known so long, a gradual stranger, yet not strange.

Then, quite suddenly, he was with us less each month:
cars and sermons given up, and breathless hobbles round the block, and bumpy lifts to Spartan gospel halls.
In time that morning expedition beyond the bedroom door ceased; the handle no longer turned for an ever-frailer form to realise itself eerily between the jambs; but his strong spirit could still force a way out of a shrinking life; from bedside chairs, close to confinement, yet free, we still made contact with the father we'd known so long.

In the end he wasn't there at all: displaced to hospital bed and tied to it with tubes, then stunned by daily needle blows, dozing or waking, lidless with terror, his shrunken body torn by heart shudders, his mouth pain-tugged to an inverted V, the small voice piping with strangeness and second childhood, and he, like a child, needing to grasp our adult hands through each throe and pleading sideways ease when pangs became too sharp.
But this time the spirit could not leap the pain, he was no longer the one we'd known so long:

A father too far off; an old man, not our old man; his good brain teased by clocks and maps, muttering nonsense, then—lucid—fearing madness, that ulcerated mouth repeating private mantras or calling, 'Water! Water!' for, yes, he was burning, the body dry, so dry, then incontinent.
And as mind and flesh fell toward the darkness he cried for the light and all the vanished graces, and we cried too, though we could do nothing but tell healthy lies and walk with guilty breath away.

God's Holy Word fell from his grasp, then words for groaning he died, and we looked down, speechless, helpless, on the torn mouth, the face twisted, its ashen skin drum-tight on the nose, but loose round neck and cheek; on eye-sockets, trenched and strangely stained; and, far below, the backs of hands—those purple mats of broken veins.
Then we, heads bowed in the chemical air, fell to wondering: is this what a life, so long denied, so saintly modest, saves itself for?

(iii) Patrimony

(in memory of a Brethren lay preacher buried in Swanage Municipal Cemetery—'without a city wall')

No more living words over the broken bread
and wine,
 no more evening exhortations.
Far from Sabbath zeal,
 the saints
chorusing praise
 for a risen Lord,
he lies silent
 under silent earth.
And I stand above,
 disbelieving, dumb,
scanning the marble text to catch a sense
that might, one day,
 speak to me.
Father, may I
 in this profane art
find other words
 to witness, thrive,
and congregate
 in forms of grace?

II – BORDER RELATIONS

(i) My Old China, My Old Duch (Chang-Chun to London)

Out of the thousand million I found you;
among the devilish few,
 the thin snuffle
of Big Noses,
 you noticed me.
We met
 as arranged.
Mindful of language
 and age,
what could we do
 but circle each other,
wary as the few
 spring dogs
through my compound window, still uneaten?
You were not tall,
 as your character claimed,
but clearly bright,
 while I

tried to be
 cloudy-clever,
hiding behind
 irony, friends,
afraid to feel.
 Through three shared years we learnt
 to believe our eyes—
trust, I hope,
 that will never break—
so were joined,
 cycling through summer heat to register
 as doors were closing, I entering
 earth's largest family, you flying with me
 away from all that to land on this little island of tricky Angles.
Welcome, Min,
 but, please,
 mind your step.

(ii) Moon Lake

(Chan-Bai-Shan)

(1)

No,
 not that long ago
surely!
 Can it really be twenty years
 since we scaled
the lava track
 up into the clouds,
stone step
 on stone step,
then scree
 on scree,
slide and sink,
 slide and sink,
till mountscape
 turned mindscape
and we almost fell
 to questioning
our recent poise?

You were dressed
after Chang-Chun's
 fashionless fashion (lemon plastic jacket, scarcely thick enough for the thin, cool air, above black, slack-legged slacks),
and I
 in Liberation Army green from canvas cap
 to canvas pumps,
pitching for
 a Great March camp,
the mock-martial,
 the heroically unheroic.

(3)
Leaning into yet another steep climb
and studying
 our slow feet,
we found ourselves
 suddenly astonished
as unsuspected summit opened to the rim
 of a vast volcanic lake, moon crater
 placed on top of the world, yet in unearthly strangeness so much out.

(4)
At an invisible line across grey water
'Red China' gave way to a redder Korea,
whose camouflaged gunboats made sure
no foolhardy soul
 tried to flee
Father Kim's
 loving concrete arms,
gesturing massively
 from the far shore.

(5)
We stood on the edge,
 panting, laughing,
one lapsed

Cultural Revolutionary
hand-in-hand
with a red Capitalist Roder, and as we peered
into grey skies
that drained the sweetness from the day,
without warning
the sour clouds broke,
and all the sunset's
blocked dazzle
took the lake,
turning dull surface
to league on league
of honeyed light,
that richly glowing,
luscious light,
those twenty moonfed
years ago.

(iii) No, Not The Sixties

(Rome)

(1)
Strictly
out of sight—
that light show
in the dark room
on Bianca's
big brown bed!
Such flickering
friction
our skin
must have pulsed
black-white,
black-white,
in ever
shorter frequencies,
faster and faster—
strobe crazy—
till colour rose
from below
in rainbow arches.

(2)
Nothing heavy!
Two bodies
sheet-dancing,
as they should,

to the insistent rhythms of the night—
 bright, excited chatter, laughter, horns—
 that floated up
 from the Roman street,
 inciting as Moon-skin,
 to underscore
 our delighted cries.

(3)
 After such son et lumière
 did our soft machines
 hum
 like processed words,
 glow like lasers?
 Lazarus from the dead
 could not have felt more satisfied
 with flesh!
 So,
 comfortably clothed
 in skin,
 we faced each other
 nakedly, beamed like the Italian sun that puts the best hidden into the shade,
 chuckled
 like piazza fountains,
 but at no joke—
 except our lives
 come to these chance
 white sheets.
 Then you sang
 lightly
 of a world
 without Butterflies
 or blues,
 and from just above
 the tilting
 tiled roof
 a full spring moon—
 silver on red—
 shone down
 through open shutters.
 And two
 not-so-young lovers—
 one grey head,

one refusing to grey—
were caught there
in pure clair de lunacy, blissfully mad
as March hares,
lovingly loopy
under the she-wolf's
brazen tits,
our late Lupercalia
all but over,
darkness—for the moment—
forgotten.

Far out! Really far out!

That brief, crazy world of sound and light.

III – THERE YOU ARE

(i) Coup

Poor Min,
you thought your body was your own, but she showed you you were wrong, seizing control before you knew she was there, slyly deflecting the moon's tug till she could deliver you again to blood, the blood of tearing free. Bestial to begin with (tadpole, frog, porpoise, pig), by aping you she grew human at last, crouched female knot of flesh, pushing fingers, toes defiantly through warm solutions, heart-bulb pulsing danger in the dark.
Soon you found your life, your body, pear-shaped to her demands, craving food, more food, strange food till she forced you force it up again, telling you how starved of sex you were till you binged on new positions, then, replete, thought you heard her foetal whisper you were gross, your belly bloated, breasts swinging like evening udders, nipples blackened, flapped, corollas spread like spilt oil.
She used your stomach as her map, plotting a dotted downward line as though to tell surgeons, 'Quick, cut here and let me out!' Growing, she made you groan before your time to have you think how hard labour is, sending swollen legs, sore joints and stomach cramps. Later, she got her kicks, punting your oval belly into touch, rucking your nights, your days till, bored, she got her head down at last and forced a painful way through gaps and knees—a messy try!—to milk her celebrations.

(ii) Safe Delivery

(Crow variations)

Such desert cries,
flooded eyes,
little life,
the skull malleable,
limbs unfired.

Such Oxfam sucks,
cliff-edge clutch,
little life,
the breath so sprinted,
heart so stalked.

Then first smile,
delectable affinities.

O don't stop
breathing,
beating,
being,
little life.

(iii) Sound Wonder

We speak
 with smiles—
what more can we say?—
that silent lexis
 of lips we love,
written on the skin,
 then signed
and countersigned
 in cheeky marks of joy.

And there are sounds

you feel
I should know:
 giggles, gurgles, grunts,
hushed confidences,
 shrieks,
and those long descants, skylarking songs
sans words
 I struggle to repeat,
cracked bass
 to baby treble—
scat
 or scatty?

You say nothing
 wisely,
full of simple vocables,
 sound wonder,
so sure I follow
 that I try.
You point to, sigh
 at glowing worlds
I can no longer see:
 the switch that Christmases the cellar, while four flapping pigeons vanish the lawn
 and cupboards open-sesame to jewelled jars.

You waddle through a country of surprise:
mountainous dressers,
 pine glades
of chair and table leg
 and thick rug meadows.
Doors give way
 to other worlds
and you glance back
 to see
familiar landmarks
 turning strange.
'Oh,' you cry. 'Oh!'
 and 'Ow!'
as what should not be there
brings you down
 giving everything to tears, then forgetting
 when next moment's

blazing wonder
dries the eyes.

Yes, stumble through each good day
till I almost think
it's so.

I'll lumber after
to sit at your soft feet, while you profess
your deepest babble.
Teach me where to look
and how to go until I think I should rethink
everything
I think I know.

IV – RUNNING FOR LIFE: VALENTINE'S PARK

(In memoriam Denise Levertov, daughter of Ilford, who communed with spirits in the park.)

(i)

Mad? Maybe.	Masochistic? Perhaps.
But just set	your heavy head,
tight leaden sinews,	on a jogging rack and let your body	stretch
into the dawn.	Soon oxygen will lighten, loosen	your whole frame,
then how easily	you'll slip the straps of pain, relaxing to a joy	that rises, rises till it leaves you	training air—high!

(ii)

The morning run—	every day:
Saturday, Sunday,	weekday,

sick day, strain day,
even Christmas Day
but railing-gaps
for a quick squeeze
birthday, bank holiday, when gates stay chained,
gape
to fenced liberty.)

(iii)

Summer: ten past six.
Running from Ilford's (unlikely), (semi-detached),
(fully attached,
and child at fifty
surprising fox and cub,
from tipped bins,
sturdy legs hurling a red blur running up Cranbrook Road in rain, in snow,
to skirt the Square,
houses standing back
approaching park gates that lean to ask
'Why are you
when all you are doing Pushing creaking iron to kick the cinder path our East India shyster's Winter: ten-to-seven.
bourgeois ease
unmortgaged house
loving wife
I hope),
(bizarre);
fire eyes swivelling
ripped refuse bags,
at green cover;
past solitary bus-stop waiters darkness and first light Ilford's brief 'village,' in smug satisfaction;
under concrete urns
a classic question,
dying to run
is running to die?'
apart
past Valentine's House, listed chateau

(first entrant to Love or Trade's demesne?),
so many bijou boughs,
homeless leaves,
so much enclosed earth,
common grass.

(iv)

No, not locked,
surely!
Park-keepers
still asleep
or will that mythical dog, figured at the gate—
'patrolled area:
beware!'—
finally find flesh
to uncurl lips
and launch its snarled incisors at my wrists?
No! No panting slobber, no ominous pads
make horror music
in the shadows.
Relax:
the grounds are yours,
the air is icy blue-black,
the moon a sliver,
and one shooting star—
Boeing? UFO?—
moves silently
across the sky—
to Stansted
or deep space?

(v)

Race down
your narrow tarmac
into the lamp's
yellow glow,
shooting beyond
your breath barrier
as you re-enter the dark;
or tread
through midsummer treacle, wind rollers
and the rain's
bead curtains

in thigh defiance
 of a world's weather;
 then whenever air's
 intangible
 force singlet, shorts, shoes—everything!—
 through what can no longer resist.

(vi)

Why not jog over the bridge, breaking that pack of geese as you accelerate round the lake's rising curve, then duck through rhododendrons to a smaller bridge, opening on acres
 of downhill grass?
 Yes, chase the fleeing horizon till you lose
 or freewheel into a sun, Martian red
 over ankle mist,
 but take the keepers' hut for turn
 and lean hard into the home run.
 The incline will leave
 you panting
 like a dog
 at dogs
 that emerge
 from half light (raw slaves,
 held by collar and chain), barking back at their barks, blissed out—Barking mad.

(vii)

Spurt up the street
 those last one hundred yards through car tunnels,
 glass-sealed from glory,
 the pigeons' dry departing clap, your only applause;
 breast the invisible tape, putting leg breaks on like indoor sprinters
 at the wall.
 Then gulp triumphant air,

head endorphin-high,
flesh free from pain,
Well, are you now ready, willing tired, yet so richly calm.
fit for life,
to run down another day?

V – BEING THERE

(Swanage)

(i) Calm summer dawn,
dense mist
over ebbd sea—
such thick emptiness!
Yet how can this vague shifting lack so firmly deny
all prospect of Needle
or facing shore,
of a world
beyond this bay
where we stand—
Old Harry
nowhere to be seen
and Alf's
scarcely utopian isle
unplaced in sea?
Even the jetty's
half lost
in moist absence!
Swanage
entirely reduced to itself!
Absurd?
Not quite for—look!—
this vaporous void's becoming something,
a luminous zone
of mother-of-pearl,
as dull wet air
embodies the rising sun;
and—listen!—
rare silence is spreading through the visible:
waves so reluctant to fall
to any kind of splash, the sea could be

blue sky
 with gulls bobbing in air, their strangulated cries finally mute.
So why don't we,
 though cynical, false,
for once
 commit ourselves to wonder, walk down that jetty
 past contingent dogs
towards a glory
 glowing there,
a saturated radiance,
 silence of ambiguous distance?

(ii) New World Ordure

(Looking down on Swanage Beach, 1 January 2000)

Sea turd brown,
sky no cleaner
and the wind's dirty tricks, flushing a shore road with shingle, salt-slush, sand, then hurling gulls
like sewer stink
halfway across town,
while driven rain
hand-dries wall hedges
with electric wriggles.
Morning sludgy as any night, odd smudged figures leaning into soiled elements, wishing they were clean away, and stray dogs
squatting, lifting legs to a new-brand millennium—scat-, not eschatology.

A world
boggy beyond belief?
A globalised jakes?

You nod
and stare down on Swanage.

Pretty shitty prospect!
